Localization of lead in the brain after subcutaneous injection of lead citrate in rats. The effect of lead injected subcutaneously on the lead content of the brain and its distribution was investigated in rats, using atomic absorption spectrometry. Lead, as a complex ion of lead citrate (PC), was found to be retained in the brain for a long time, although the overall concentration decreased with time. The concentration of lead in the brain was not reduced immediately after the subcutaneous injection of PC, but showed a tendency to decrease. The brain was the most affected organ for retention of lead, followed by the kidneys, blood, and the liver. Lead was also found to be retained in the brain, even after the injection of lead chloride (PCd), which is a complex of lead and citrate ion. The lead content in the brain was much higher with the injection of PCd than with the injection of PC. These results suggest that PC plays an important role in the retention of lead in the brain and in the retention of PCd in the brain, and that subcutaneous injection of PC or PCd into rats results in the localization of lead in the brain."I can understand the frustration. We are in the business of trying to help people deal with things that are important to them," O'Brien said. "The government is not banning them. If you love something, if you want to make it a part of your life and make it a part of your life, you should be allowed to use it. I understand people's frustration. But you can't have that frustration in an office." "If you don't do something to try and help these people, if you don't do something to get them connected to their government, then you're going to have a broken society," he said. "But that's not the objective." Mr Johnson said there was not a shortage of prescriptions. "We have had a fantastic run," he said. He said the drug review process was already underway. 82157476af
